Fairy Tales and Fables

Compiled by Rachel E. North
FAIRY TALES AND FABLES

COMPILED
BY RACHEL E. NORTH
FOR USE WITH CHARLOTTE MASON BEEHIVE’S FORM I TALES CURRICULUM (UNIT 1.1)

CONTAINING STORIES FROM:
CHARLES PERRAULT, THE BROTHERS GRIMM, HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN, AND AESOP’S FABLES

CHARLOTTE MASON BEEHIVE
MELTON MOWBRAY
2021
This new compilation of classic fairy tales and fables is a brand new transcription, prepared and edited by Rachel North, for the exclusive use of Charlotte Mason Beehive. It is based off scans of the original Victorian editions of the works, which have now entered the public domain.

Cover design by James North

Front cover art—Hansel and Gretel, illustration by Heinrich Leutemann or, Carl Offterdinger / Public domain

All rights reserved. This book or any portion thereof may not be reproduced or used in any manner whatsoever without prior written permission from the publisher.

Charlotte Mason Beehive
charlottemasonbeehive.co.uk
INTRODUCTION

A KEY feature in Victorian educator, Charlotte Mason’s programmes, sent out to home schoolrooms in the early twentieth century, was the inclusion of fairy tales for the very youngest of students.

Beginning their education in Form IB, the six year old children were assigned three to four fairy tales and three to four Aesop’s Fables per term. These stories were often taken from the writings of Hans Christen Andersen or The Brothers Grimm. As such, Charlotte Mason Beehive has attempted to emulate this model in our Form I Tales [Literature] curriculum.

Containing all the stories necessary to complete the 36 week lesson plan as laid out in the Teacher’s Guide and Lesson Plan for this course, Fairy Tales and Fables, has been specially published for this purpose.

Four fairy tales and four Aesop’s Fables have been assigned per term, selected exclusively from the writings of storytellers, Charles Perrault, The Brothers Grimm, Hans Christen Andersen, and Aesop—with one exception, Mme. Le. Prince de Beaumont’s ‘Beauty and the Beast’, which we feel makes for a worthy addition to a book of fairy tales.

A LITTLE ABOUT THE MASTER STORYTELLERS

Charles Perrault—often credited with bringing us the fairy tale as we know it today, this Paris-born lawyer-turned-writer is said to have invented the fairy tale genre, and had a significant influence on the fairy tale collections compiled by The Brothers Grimm nearly a century later.

Many of the fairy tales as we know them today can trace their roots back to the writings of Charles Perrault in the seventeenth century, who often published tamer, cleaner versions of these classic tales. Responsible for such gems as ‘Little Red Riding Hood’, ‘Cinderella’, ‘Puss in Boots’, ‘The Sleeping Beauty’, and ‘Bluebeard’, many of these stories today closely resemble the way he first penned them.

We have selected three of his stories for our collection of fairy tales, ‘The Fairies’, ‘Puss in Boots’, and ‘The Sleeping Beauty in the Wood’. These have been taken from Tales of Passed Times, published by J. M. Dent & Co. in 1900.

The Brothers Grimm—These two brothers from Germany, Jacob (1785-1863) and Wilhelm (1786-1859), were not only storytellers but story-collectors. So many of the fairy stories attributed to them were not of their own imaginings. At a time when increased industrialisation was threatening the culture and practices of the common people, the Grimm brothers were determined to preserve the traditional folk stories that had been orally passed down from generation to generation and were in danger of being lost forever.

So many of the stories synonymous with our childhood can be attributed to the efforts of these two brothers, such as ‘Snow White’, ‘Cinderella’, Little Red Riding Hood’, etc. It should not surprise us to discover, however, that the sanitised version of these tales we know so well are far sweeter than the dark, gruesome tales told to children two hundred years ago.

Their first collection of folk stories was published in 1812, and was shortly followed by a second volume in 1815. The translation we have chosen for our curriculum is Grimm's Household Tales [1884], translated from the German by Margaret Hunt. Claiming it to be the first translation aimed at presenting the stories precisely as given by the brothers, “who wrote down every story exactly as they heard it”, Ms Hunt “endeavoured to give the stories exactly as they are in the German original […] and have always respected the principle which was paramount with the brothers Grimm themselves.”

The stories chosen for this collection are ‘Hansel and Grethel’, ‘Little Snow-white’, ‘The Valiant Little Tailor’, and ‘The Fisherman and his Wife’.

Hans Christen Andersen—the beauty and eloquence of Mr. Andersen’s writings cannot be overstated. This Danish writer who lived from 1805–1875 is well-known and much loved the world over. His stories which include such classics as ‘The Little Mermaid’, ‘The Ugly Duckling’, and ‘The Emperor’s New Clothes’ are often much darker than you may have heard them told before.

A devoted—yet markedly flawed [as are we all]—Christian, his writings are steeped in religious thought and imagery, although parents should beware that his theology may not completely match their own. There is often a theme of works-based religion underlying some of the messages in his stories and therefore parents may wish to take time to discuss these ideas with their children.

There are four of his stories included in this selection, yet due to their length they span many weeks of this year long curriculum. The stories included are ‘The Snow Queen’, ‘The Mermaid’, ‘The Goloshes of Fortune’, and ‘The Marsh King’s Daughter’.

They have been taken from Fairy Tales from Hans Christen Andersen [1899], translated by Mrs E. Lucas, a Danish speaker whose great aim was to “reproduce as closely as possible the spirit and the style of the original.”

HOW TO USE THIS BOOK?

This book is designed to be read over the course of one year, according to the Lesson Plan laid out in the Teacher’s Guide and Lesson Plan, Unit 1.1. Two twenty minute lessons are taken each week, which includes lessons devoted to drawing scenes from tales you have read, and two examinations at the end of each twelve week term.

Short lessons:-

Short lessons are a key component of a Charlotte Mason education and therefore the chapters (lessons) have been arranged for completion within a twenty minute time-frame (including narration).

Some chapters have therefore been split into parts and the readings spread across more than one lesson. This is noted clearly by Roman numerals marking the text.

Narration Breaks:-

You will find the narrative broken up periodically by three stars marking the break in text (). This indicates an appropriate place to pause the narrative and request a narration if you feel it is necessary to do so.

For beginner narrators, young children, and new students this may be a helpful tool but you do not need to stop at any or all stopping places. It is advised that you work towards the goal of being able to complete an entire episode before calling on narration.

We sincerely hope you have a pleasant and engaging school year reading Fairy Tales and Fables with your students. If you have any questions or concerns please contact us through our website at charlottemasonbeehive.co.uk.

Rachel E. North,
August 2020

---

1 For more information on narration please see the ‘Tales 1.1: Teacher’s Guide and Lesson Plan’.
Table of Contents

Beauty and the Beast  ................................................................................................................................. 9
 I........................................................................................................................................................................ 9
 II........................................................................................................................................................................... 15
 III.......................................................................................................................................................................... 20
The Shepherd-Boy and the Wolf ................................................................................................................. 27
Hansel and Grethel ......................................................................................................................................... 28
 I........................................................................................................................................................................... 28
 II........................................................................................................................................................................... 32
The Dog and the Shadow ............................................................................................................................ 38
The Snow Queen .......................................................................................................................................... 39
 I—First Story..................................................................................................................................................... 39
 II—Second Story................................................................................................................................................ 40
 III—Third Story................................................................................................................................................ 46
 I........................................................................................................................................................................... 46
 II........................................................................................................................................................................... 50
 IV—Fourth Story............................................................................................................................................... 54
 I........................................................................................................................................................................... 54
 II........................................................................................................................................................................... 58
 V—Fifth Story..................................................................................................................................................... 62
 VI—Sixth Story.................................................................................................................................................. 67
 VII—Seventh Story........................................................................................................................................... 70
The Fox and the Stork ................................................................................................................................. 76
The Fairies ..................................................................................................................................................... 77
The Wind and the Sun .................................................................................................................................... 80
The Goloshes of Fortune .............................................................................................................................. 81
 I—Fortune’s Handmaiden................................................................................................................................... 81
 II—What happened to the Councillor.................................................................................................................. 83
 III—The Watchman’s Adventure....................................................................................................................... 89
 IV—A Critical Moment—An Evening’s Dramatic Reading—A Most Unusual Journey............................................. 93
 V—The Metamorphosis of the Copying Clerk..................................................................................................... 98
 I........................................................................................................................................................................... 98
 II........................................................................................................................................................................... 101
 VI—The Last Best Gift of the Goloshes............................................................................................................... 105
Mercury and the Woodman ........................................................................................................................... 111
Master Cat; or, Puss in Boots.................................................................113
The Ant and the Grasshopper.................................................................119
Little Snow-White...................................................................................120
  I............................................................................................................120
  II..........................................................................................................125
The Goose with the Golden Eggs.........................................................131
The Mermaid..........................................................................................132
  I............................................................................................................132
  II..........................................................................................................137
  III........................................................................................................144
  IV.........................................................................................................150
The Wolf in Sheep’s Clothing.................................................................158
The Valiant Little Tailor........................................................................159
  I............................................................................................................159
  II..........................................................................................................163
The Lion and the Mouse.........................................................................169
The Sleeping Beauty in the Wood.........................................................170
  I............................................................................................................170
  II..........................................................................................................174
The Country Mouse and the Town Mouse...........................................181
The Fisherman and his Wife.................................................................183
  I............................................................................................................183
  II..........................................................................................................188
The Hare and the Tortoise......................................................................194
The Marsh King’s Daughter.................................................................195
  I............................................................................................................195
  II..........................................................................................................201
  III......................................................................................................207
  IV......................................................................................................211
  V......................................................................................................217
  VI......................................................................................................222
  VII..................................................................................................226
  VIII................................................................................................232
The Fox and the Crow............................................................................236
BEAUTY AND THE BEAST

AS TOLD BY JEANNE-MARIE LEPRINCE DE BEAUMONT

(TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH IN ‘TALES OF PASSED TIMES’, 1900)

I

There was once a merchant, who was very, very rich. He had six children, three boys and three girls, and as he was a man of good sense, he spared no expense in order that they might be well educated, and gave them masters of every kind. His daughters were all beautiful, but his youngest one was especially admired, and from the time she was a small child, had been only known and spoken of as “Beauty.” The name remained with her as she grew older, which gave rise to a great deal of jealousy on the part of her sisters. The young girl was not only more beautiful than they were, but also kinder and more amiable.

The elder daughters gave themselves great airs, for they were overweeningly proud of being so rich, and would not condescend to receive visits from the daughters of other merchants, as they only cared for the society of people in high position. Not a day passed that they did not go to a ball, or a theatre, or for a drive or walk in a fashionable part of the town, and they made fun of their sister, who spent a great part of her time in study. The girls received many offers of marriage from well-to-do merchants, as they were known to be rich, but the two elder ones replied, that they did not intend to marry anyone, unless a duke or an earl could be found for a husband.

Beauty, the youngest, was more polite, and thanked those who asked for her hand, but she was, as she told them, too young as yet, and wished to remain for a few more years as a companion to her father.
Then, all at once, the merchant lost the whole of his fortune; nothing was left to him but a little house, situated far away in the country. He told his children, weeping, that they would be obliged to go and live there, and that, even then, they would have to support themselves by the work of their own hands. His two elder daughters refused to leave the town; they had many admirers, they said, who would be only too glad to marry them, although they were now without fortune. But these young ladies found themselves greatly mistaken, for their admirers did not even care to look at them, now that they were poor. They had made themselves generally disliked, on account of their haughty behaviour. “They do not deserve to be pitied,” said everyone; “we are very glad that their pride is humbled; let them go and play the fine lady, keeping sheep.”

But people spoke differently of Beauty. “We are very sorry,” they said, “that she is in trouble; she is such a good girl! she always spoke so kindly to the poor! she was so gentle and courteous!” Several of her suitors, also, still wished to marry her, although she had not a penny, but she told them that she could not think of leaving her father in his distress, and that she intended going with him into the country, to comfort him, and help with the work. Beauty was very unhappy at losing her fortune, but she said to herself, “It is no use crying, tears will not give me back my riches; I must try and be happy without them.”

As soon as they were settled in their country house, the merchant and his sons began to till the ground. Beauty rose every morning at four o’clock, and made haste to clean the house and prepare the dinner. She found her duties very painful and fatiguing at first, for she had not been accustomed to do the work of a servant; but in two months’ time she had grown stronger, and the activity of her life gave her fresh health and colour. When her day’s work was over, she amused herself with reading, or music; sometimes she sat down to her wheel, and sang to her spinning. Meanwhile her two sisters were wearied to death with the dullness of their life; they stayed in bed till ten o’clock, did nothing all day but saunter about, and for their only diversion talked with regret of their former fine clothes and friends. “Look at our young sister,” they said to one another; “she is so low-minded and stupid, that she is quite content with her miserable condition.”

The good merchant thought differently: he knew that Beauty was better fitted to shine in society than they were; he admired the good qualities of his youngest child, especially her patience, for her sisters, not content with allowing her to do all the work of the house, took every opportunity of insulting her.

***

The family had lived in this solitude for a year, when a letter arrived for the merchant, telling him that a vessel, on which there was merchandise belonging to him, had arrived safely in port. The two elder girls were nearly out of their minds with joy when they heard this good news, for now they hoped that they should be able to leave the country. They begged their father, ere he departed, to bring them back dresses and capes, head-dresses, and all sorts of odds and ends of fancy attire. Beauty asked for nothing; for, as she thought to herself, all the money that the merchandise would bring in, would not be sufficient to pay for everything that her sisters wished for.

“Is there nothing you wish me to buy for you?” her father said to her.

“As you are so kind as to think of me,” she replied, “I pray you to bring me a rose, for we have not one here.” Now Beauty did not really care about the rose, but she had no wish to seem, by her example, to reprove her sisters, who would have said that she did not ask for anything, in order to make herself appear more considerate than they were.

The father left them, but on arriving at his destination, he had to go to law about his merchandise, and after a great deal of trouble, he turned back home as poor as he came. He had not many more miles to go, and was already enjoying, in anticipation, the pleasure of seeing his children again, when, passing on his journey through a large wood, he lost his way. It was snowing hard; the wind was so violent that he was twice blown off his horse, and, as the night was closing in, he was afraid that he would die of cold and hunger, or that he would be eaten by the wolves, that he could hear howling around him.

All at once, however, he caught sight of a bright light, which appeared to be some way off, at the further end of a long avenue of trees. He walked towards it, and soon saw that it came from a splendid castle, which was brilliantly illuminated. The merchant thanked God for the help that had been sent him, and hastened towards the castle, but was greatly surprised, on reaching it, to find no one in the courtyard, or about the entrances. His horse, which was following him, seeing the door of a large stable standing open, went in, and finding there some hay and oats, the poor animal, half dead for want of food, began eating with avidity.

The merchant fastened him up in the stable, and went towards the house, but still no one was to be seen; he walked into a large dining-hall, and there he found a good fire, and a table laid for one person, covered with provisions. Being wet to the skin with the rain and snow, he drew near the fire to dry himself, saying, as he did so, “The master of this house, or his servants, will pardon me the liberty I am taking; no doubt they will soon appear.” He waited for a considerable time; but when eleven o’clock had struck, and still he had seen no one, he could no longer resist the feeling of hunger, and seizing a chicken, he ate it up in two mouthfuls, trembling the while. Then he took a draught or two of wine, and, his courage returning, he left the dining-hall and made his way through several large rooms magnificently furnished. Finally he came to a room where there was a comfortable bed, and as it was now past midnight, and he was very tired, he made up his mind to shut the door and lie down.

It was ten o’clock next morning before he awoke, when, to his great surprise, he found new clothes put in place of his own, which had been completely spoiled. “This palace must certainly belong to some good fairy,” he said to himself, “who, seeing my condition, has taken pity upon me.” He looked out of the window; the snow was gone, and he saw instead, bowers of delicious flowers which were a delight to the eye.

He went again into the dining-hall where he had supped the night before, and saw a little table with chocolate upon it. “I thank you, good madam fairy,” he said aloud, “for your kindness in thinking of my breakfast.”

The merchant, having drunk his chocolate, went out to find his horse; as he passed under a bower of roses, he remembered that Beauty had asked him to bring her one, and he plucked a branch on which several were growing. He had scarcely done so, when he heard a loud roar, and saw coming towards him a Beast, of such a horrible aspect, that he nearly fainted.

“You are very ungrateful,” said the Beast in a terrible voice; “I received you into my castle, and saved your life, and now you steal my roses, which I care for more than anything else in the world. Death alone can make amends for what you have done; I give you a quarter of an hour, no more, in which to ask forgiveness of God.”

The merchant threw himself on his knees, and with clasped hands, said to the Beast, “I pray you, my lord, to forgive me. I did not think to offend you by picking a rose for one of my daughters, who asked me to take it her.”

“I am not called my lord,” responded the monster, “but simply the Beast. I do not care for compliments; I like people to say what they think; so do not think to mollify me with your flattery. But you tell me you have some daughters; I will pardon you on condition that one of your daughters will come of her own free will to die in your place. Do not stop to argue with me; go! and if your daughter refuses to die for you, swear that you will return yourself in three months’ time.”

The merchant had no intention of sacrificing one of his daughters to this hideous monster, but he thought, “At least I shall have the pleasure of embracing them once more.” He swore therefore to return, and the Beast told him that he might go when he liked; “but,” added he, “I do not wish you to go from me with empty hands. Go back to the room in which you slept, there you will find a large empty trunk; you may fill it with whatever you please, and I will have it conveyed to your house.” With these words the Beast withdrew, and the merchant said to himself, “If I must die, I shall at least have the consolation of leaving my children enough for their daily bread.”

He returned to the room where he had passed the night, and finding there a great quantity of gold pieces, he filled the trunk, of which the Beast had spoken, with these, closed it, and remounting his horse, which he found still in the stable, he rode out from the castle, his sadness now as great as had been his joy on entering it. His horse carried him of its own accord along one of the roads through the forest, and in a few hours the merchant was again in his own little house.
II

His children gathered round him; but instead of finding pleasure in their caresses, he began to weep as he looked upon them. He held in his hand the branch of roses which he had brought for Beauty. “Take them,” he said, as he gave them to her, “your unhappy father has paid dearly for them.” And then he told his family of the melancholy adventure that had befallen him.

The two elder girls, when they had heard his tale, cried and screamed, and began saying all sorts of cruel things to Beauty, who did not shed a tear. “See what the pride of this wretched little creature has brought us to!” said they. “Why couldn’t she ask for wearing apparel as we did? but no, she must needs show herself off as a superior person. It is she who will be the cause of our father’s death, and she does not even cry!”

“That would be of little use,” replied Beauty. “Why should I cry about my father’s death? He is not going to die. Since the monster is willing to accept one of his daughters, I will give myself up to him, that he may vent his full anger upon me; and I am happy in so doing, for by my death I shall have the joy of saving my father, and of proving my love for him.”

“No, my sister,” said the three brothers, “you shall not die; we will go and find out this monster, and we will either kill him or die beneath his blows.”

“Do not hope to kill him,” said their father to them; “for the Beast is so powerful, that I fear there are no means by which he could be destroyed. My Beauty’s loving heart fills mine with gladness, but she shall not be exposed to such a terrible death. I am old, I have but a little while to live; I shall but lose a few years of life, which I regret on your account, and on yours alone, my children.”
“I am determined, my father,” said Beauty, “that you shall not return to that castle without me; you cannot prevent me following you. Although I am young, life has no great attraction for me, and I would far rather be devoured by the monster than die of the grief which your death would cause me.”

In vain the others tried to dissuade her, Beauty persisted in her determination to go to the castle; and her sisters were not sorry about it, for the virtues of their young sister had aroused in them a strong feeling of jealousy.

The merchant was so taken up with grief at losing his daughter, that he quite forgot about the trunk which he had filled with gold pieces, but, to his astonishment, he had no sooner shut himself into his room for the night, than he found it beside his bed. He resolved not to tell his children of his newly-obtained riches, for he knew that his daughters would then wish to return to the town, and he had made up his mind to die where he was in the country. He confided his secret, however, to Beauty, who told him that there had been visitors at the house during his absence, among them two who were in love with her sisters. She begged her father to marry them; for she was so good of heart, that she loved them and freely forgave them all the unkindness they had shown her.

The two hard-hearted girls rubbed their eyes with an onion that they might shed tears on the departure of their father and Beauty; but the brothers wept sincerely, as did also the merchant; Beauty alone would not cry, fearing that it might increase their sorrow. The horse took the road that led to the castle, and as evening fell, it came in view, illuminated as before. Again the horse was the only one in the stable, and once more the merchant entered the large dining-hall, this time with his daughter, and there they found the table magnificently laid for two.
The merchant had not the heart to eat; but Beauty, doing her utmost to appear cheerful, sat down to the table and served him to something. Then she said to herself, “The Beast wants to fatten me before he eats me, since he provides such good cheer.”

They had finished their supper, when they heard a great noise, and the merchant, weeping, said farewell to his poor daughter, for he knew it was the Beast. Beauty could not help shuddering when she saw the dreadful shape approaching; but she did her best not to give way to her fear, and when the Beast asked her if it was of her own free will that she had come, she told him, trembling, that it was so.

“You are very good, and I am much obliged to you,” said the Beast. “Good man, tomorrow morning you will leave, and do not venture ever to come here again.”

“Goodbye, Beast,” replied Beauty, and the Beast immediately retired.

“Alas! my daughter,” said the merchant, clasping Beauty in his arms, “I am half dead with fright. Listen to me, and leave me here.”

“No, my father,” said Beauty, without faltering. “You will depart tomorrow morning, and you will leave me under Heaven’s protection, maybe I shall find pity and help.”

They retired to rest, thinking that they would have no sleep that night; but no sooner were they in bed than their eyes closed. In her dreams there appeared to Beauty a lady, who said to her, “I have pleasure in the goodness of your heart, Beauty; your good action in giving your life to save that of your father will not be without its reward.” Beauty told her father next morning of her dream, and although it afforded him some consolation, it did not prevent his loud cries of grief when at last he was forced to bid goodbye to his dear daughter.

***
After his departure, Beauty went back and sat down in the dining-hall, and began weeping herself. She was, however, of a courageous disposition, and so she commended herself to God, and resolved not to be miserable during the short time still left her to live, for she quite thought that the Beast would eat her that evening. In the meanwhile she resolved to walk about and look over the fine castle she was in. She found it impossible not to admire its beauty, but her surprise was great when she came to a door over which was written: Beauty’s Room. She hastily opened the door, and was dazzled by the magnificence of the whole apartment; what most attracted her admiration, however, was a large bookcase, a piano, and several books of music.

“He does not wish me to feel dull,” she said in a low voice. Then the thought came to her, “If I was only going to live here a day, there would not have been so much provided for my amusement.” This thought revived her courage.

She opened the bookcase and there saw a book on which was written in letters of gold:

“Wish what you like, Command what you will, You alone are Queen and Mistress here.”

“Alas!” she murmured, sighing, “I wish for nothing but to see my dear father again, and to know what he is doing at this moment.” She had only said this to herself in a low voice, what was her surprise, therefore, when, turning towards a large mirror, she saw her home, and her father, just returned, wearing a sad countenance; her sisters went forward to meet him, and in spite of the expression of sorrow which they tried to assume, it was evident in their faces that they were delighted to have lost their sister.
In another minute, the picture had disappeared, and Beauty could not help thinking that the Beast was very kind hearted, and that she had not much to fear from him.

She found the table laid for her at noon, and during her dinner she was entertained with a delightful concert, although no creature was visible.

In the evening, as she was just sitting down to her meal, she heard the sound of the Beast’s voice, and could not help shuddering. “Beauty,” said the monster to her, “will you allow me to look on while you are eating your supper?”

“You are master here,” replied Beauty, trembling.

“Not so,” rejoined the Beast, “it is you who alone are mistress; if I annoy you, you have only to tell me to go, and I will leave you at once. But confess now, you think me very ugly, do you not?”

“That is true,” said Beauty, “for I cannot tell a lie; but I think you are very kind.”

“You are right,” said the monster; “but, besides being ugly, I am also stupid; I know, well enough, that I am only a Beast.”

“No one is stupid, who believes himself to be wanting in intelligence, it is the fool who is not aware of being without it.”

“Eat, Beauty,” said the monster to her, “and try to find pleasure in your own house; for everything here belongs to you. I should be very sorry if you were unhappy.”

“You are everything that is kind,” said Beauty. “I assure you that your goodness of heart makes me happy; when I think of that, you no longer appear so ugly to me.”

“Ah, yes!” replied the Beast, “I have a kind heart, but for all that I am a monster.”

“Many men are more monsters than you,” said Beauty; “and I care more for you with your countenance, than for those who with their human face hide a false, corrupt, and ungrateful heart.”

“If I had sufficient wit,” responded the Beast, “I would make you a pretty answer in return for your words; but I am too stupid for that, and all I can say is, that I am very grateful to you.”

Beauty ate her supper with a good appetite. She had lost almost all her fear of the monster, but she almost died of fright, when he said, “Beauty, will you be my wife?”

She sat for a while without answering; she was alarmed at the thought of arousing the monster’s anger by refusing him. Nevertheless she finally said, trembling, “No, Beast.” At this the poor monster sighed, and the hideous sound he made echoed throughout the castle, but Beauty was soon reassured, for the Beast, after sadly bidding her adieu, left the room, turning his head from time to time to look at her again.

A strong feeling of compassion for the Beast came over Beauty when she was left alone. “Alas!” she said, “it is a pity he is so ugly, for he is so good!”

III

Beauty spent three months in the castle, more or less happily. The Beast paid her a visit every evening, and conversed with her as she ate her supper, showing good sense in his talk, but not what the world deems cleverness. Every day Beauty discovered some fresh good quality in the monster; she grew accustomed to his ugliness, and far from fearing his visit, she would often look at her watch to see if it was nearly nine o’clock, for the Beast always arrived punctually at that hour. There was only one thing which caused distress to Beauty, and that was, that every evening before retiring, the monster asked her if